Consequently, so far as uterine bleeding is concerned, and this is the chief symptom upon which we rest our diagnosis of benignancy, it follows the normal physiologic law of periodicity. Therefore, when the normal menstrual flow is converted into a menorrhagia, even though stretched over several days, with clean-cut intermenstrual intervals of no bleeding or discharge, the clinical assumption in favor of benignancy is almost positive. On the other hand, cancer of the cervix or fundus is not of a constructive type of growth, and in creating its hemorrhagic symptoms deviates at once from the law of periodicity and begins to cause intermenstrual spotting, which very soon merges into a continuous flow with only the ebb and flood tide of the menstrual waves increasing and decreasing its output.
