Excerpt from Madame De Stael NE Who knew madame DE stael inti mately and was thus enabled to gather at first hand the incidents of her life, namely, Madame Necker de Saussure, has said: Her works are, so to speak, in an abstract form the memoirs of her life. Madame de Stael her self said as much: When one writes to sat isfy the inspiration that possesses the soul, one s writings will involuntarily reveal every shade s manner of living and thinking. Thus I propose seeking the inspiration of Madame de Stael s works by studying the events of her life. Our earliest impressions of the external world become, unconsciously to us, the prism by which everything is afterward colored. With Chateaubriand, it was the gloomy solitudes of Combourg, the heavy mists skirting the ocean and bounded only by the forests through which the storm-winds whistled. With Lamartine, it was the hills of Milly, a country home with quiet neighboring paths, a...
