Forgotten Books, 2018. Hardback. Condition: New. Language: English . Brand New Book ***** Print on Demand *****. Excerpt from Conciliation and Arbitration In all stoppages of work, great and small, the purchasing power of the people as a whole is diminished. The loss of wages and of returns on capital must lessen the demand for the products of industry. Apart from more or less measurable losses, however; industrial disputes create a psychological condition which directly affects the power of production. The constant irritation, antagonism, anxiety and ill-feeling engendered by lockouts or strikes, result in irksome work and sullen service. Unwilling or grudging service is usually bad service, and is reflected either in the amount or quality of output. Apart from trade union rules imposing restrictions on output, the psychological effect of strife on output. Must always be reckoned as one of the most anti-economic aspects of industrial warfare. Industrial society is like an organism. The whole organism functions well only when each part functions harmoniously with the whole. It is to this aspect of the problem that the Whitley Reports. Specially addressed themselves. The underlying principle of their recommendations is harmony or good feeling within each industry or works, with the corollary of willing, and, therefore, productive service. Lockouts and strikes are really an application of the theory of force to industry. Just as war has often been held to be beneficial to society on the plea either of the survival of the fittest or of its beneficial action in cultivating the finer qualities in man, so strikes have sometimes been commended from the economic point of view for good by-products. A strike in one area, it is said, results in intensified activity in another area, or in an allied industry. The actual deduction in the national...
